Community Care Corps is a national program that fosters innovative models in which local volunteers assist with non-medical tasks, provide companionship, and relieve over-burdened family caregivers. The program offers tremendous benefit to family caregivers, older adults, and persons with disabilities.

Community Care Corps has already awarded $2.44 million to 23 innovative local programs nationwide. One hundred eighty-three organizations from 45 states plus the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico applied for funds for their programs. The 23 organizations selected serve a blend of urban, suburban, rural, frontier, and Tribal communities across the U.S. Community Care Corps looks forward to funding more projects this year.

"We are excited to be able to fund even more grants and look forward to getting applications for innovative volunteer models from local communities across the country," said Paul Weiss, President of the Oasis Institute, which manages Community Care Corps for the Administration on Community Living.

"The Community Care Corps helps countless families and can have a lasting impact not just on the families and individuals served, but also on those who have the opportunity to serve their community as volunteers," added John Schall, CEO of Caregiver Action Network.
